- John Bright and William E. Gladstone were two of the most eminent Englishmen of their days. Both were distinguished in public life and were often opposed by each other in their views to particular questions. Consequently they were often thought of as rivals, particularly in the matter of influence over their fellowmen. The followers of Mr. Gladstone used to call him the greatest living Englishman. In the same way the followers of Mr. Bright applied the same term to their leader.

One day Mr. Bright happened to overhear a gentleman's wife saying severe things to Gladstone. Turning to her he asked her whether her son had ever seen that gentleman. Much surprised, the lady answered, "no". "Then, Madam," said Mr. Bright, "permit me to urge you to take him at once to see the greatest Englishman he is ever likely to look upon.
