Scientists have found that generosity made people happier and promising to be more generous was enough to trigger a change in our brain giving us pleasant feeling.

Researchers said those who were concerned about the wellbeing of their fellow human beings were happier than those who focused on their own advancement. Doing something nice for another person gives many a pleasant feeling that behavioural economists call a warm glow.

Intent alone generates a neural change before the action is actually implemented. "Promising to behave generously could be used as a strategy to reinforce the desired behavior on the one hand and to feel happier on the other.
